The guiding principle of this work

Sometimes there might not be a solution available (yet) that is both accessible and environmentally-friendly

But disabled people should never be blamed or shamed for

“In Japan the disproportionate impact of climate change on disabled people is more critical because we have ongoing pressing climate challenge with earthquakes and flooding as a regular feature of our lives. These things present huge concerns for disabled people and their supporters in Japan, and also for other marginalised groups - issues ranging from understanding climate information to accessing safe shelters.

So, the importance of raising awareness on sustainability is even more pressing. This project is a way of developing awareness of the debate about, and development of, inclusive disaster risk reduction.”
